Gospel Reflection by Fr. Jon Pedigo

The Gospel passage this week, John 2:1-11, recounts the first of Jesus' "signs" in John's Gospel: the transformation of water into wine at the wedding in Cana. Traditionally, this passage has been interpreted through a supersessionist lens, emphasizing Jesus' divine authority as surpassing and replacing Judaism. However, this framework, shaped by early Christian separation from its Jewish roots and later Greco-Roman influences, risks obscuring the profound Jewish context and underlying themes of liberation in which Jesus lived and taught. This essay invites readers to consider an alternative lens—one grounded in the Torah and the struggle for liberation from the Roman Empire—that views this sign not as a rejection of Judaism, but as a deeply Jewish act revealing Jesus as the embodiment of God's covenantal promises and as an agent of liberation and social justice.

The Cana story revolves around the shortage of wine at a wedding. Reading this passage within the Jewish cultural context of First Century Israel/Judah/Palestine, we see that wine is not merely a delightful intoxicant to lift the spirits of wedding guests. (Continued on page 4...)

Reflexión por el Padre Jon Pedigo

El pasaje del Evangelio de esta semana, Juan 2:1-11, relata la primera de las "señales" de Jesús en el Evangelio de Juan: la transformación del agua en vino en la boda de Caná. Tradicionalmente, este pasaje ha sido interpretado a través de una perspectiva supersesionista, enfatizando la autoridad divina de Jesús como algo que supera y reemplaza al judaísmo. Sin embargo, moldeado por la separación del cristianismo primitivo de sus raíces judías y las influencias grecorromanas posteriores, corre el riesgo de oscurecer el profundo contexto judío y los temas subyacentes de liberación en los que Jesús vivió y enseñó. Este ensayo invita a los lectores a considerar una perspectiva alternativa, basada en la Torá y la lucha por la liberación del Imperio Romano, se ve esta señal no como un rechazo del judaísmo, sino como un acto profundamente judío que revela a Jesús como la encarnación de las promesas de la alianza de Dios y como un agente de liberación y justicia social.

La historia de Caná gira en torno a la escasez de vino en una boda. Al leer este pasaje dentro del contexto cultural judío del primer siglo, vemos que el vino no es simplemente un embriagante delicioso para levantar el ánimo de los invitados a la boda. (Continúa en la página 4...)

It is an integral element of the wedding ritual itself. In Jewish tradition, wine symbolizes transformation—it is the product of God's gift of grapes and the work of human hands. It is also deeply connected to messianic hope, representing abundance and peace. Several blessings are recited over wine using the kiddush cup (known in Romanized liturgical practice as the "chalice"), blessing God's holiness and calling the people to rise in holiness as well.

Wine takes on even greater significance in the context of a wedding. In Judaism, marriage is seen as a participation in tikkun olam, the repairing of a broken world. Through marriage, the couple—and over time, their family—is called to embody healing, unity, and justice: to care for the sick, welcome the marginalized, foster peace, and promote prosperity. The marriage covenant binds the couple to one another, but its ultimate aim is to create a family that becomes the nucleus of a community. This covenant is sealed with a shared kiddush cup of wine, symbolizing humanity's partnership with God. Guests also share wine, representing the union of families and the expansion of the community of Israel. Thus we see that wine is an essential element in a Jewish wedding and how sharing wine expresses covenant, joy, family, community, and shared mission.

Returning to John 2:3, "They have no wine," we see that the issue at Cana is not simply the absence of wine for celebration. It is the absence of the deeper communal and covenantal participation that wine represents. When Jesus instructs the servants to fill the empty purification jars with water, the narrative makes a profound connection between the water used for ritual washing and the wine used for covenantal celebration. Through the lens of Torah, this act opens up an intimate relationship between water and wine, linking it to the great liberation moments of Israel's history. Water recalls the crossing of the Red Sea, where the Israelites moved from enslavement to freedom, and the crossing of the Jordan River, where they entered the Promised Land.

The transformation of water into wine at Cana is not a replacement of Jewish ritual but a deepening of its liberative dimensions. Just as the waters of the Red Sea and the Jordan were thresholds of liberation, so too does the transformation at Cana signify a passage from ritual to joy, from preparation to participation in the fullness of covenant life. The abundance of wine reveals that the work of liberation does not end with freedom but continues into celebration, community, and shared mission. The Cana story invites us to see that the processes of liberation, transformation, and covenant are woven together in God's vision of repair and renewal for the world.

Es un elemento integral del ritual de la boda en sí. En la tradición judía, el vino simboliza la transformación: es el producto del don de Dios de las uvas y del trabajo de las manos humanas. También está profundamente conectado con la esperanza mesiánica, representando la abundancia y la paz. Se recitan varias bendiciones sobre el vino usando la copa kiddush (conocida como el "cáliz"), bendiciendo la santidad de Dios y llamando al pueblo a elevarse también en santidad.

El vino adquiere un significado aún mayor en el contexto de una boda. En el judaísmo, el matrimonio se ve como una participación en el tikkun olam, la reparación de un mundo roto. A través del matrimonio, la pareja (y con el tiempo, su familia) está llamada a encarnar la curación, la unidad y la justicia: cuidar a los enfermos, dar la bienvenida a los marginados, fomentar la paz y promover la prosperidad. El pacto matrimonial une a la pareja entre sí, pero su objetivo final es crear una familia que se convierta en el núcleo de una comunidad. Este pacto se sella con una copa de vino, que simboliza la asociación de la humanidad con Dios. Los invitados también comparten vino, lo que representa la unión de las familias y la expansión de la comunidad. Así vemos que el vino es un elemento esencial en una boda judía y cómo compartir el vino expresa pacto, alegría, familia, comunidad y misión compartida.

Volviendo a Juan 2:3, "No tienen vino", vemos que el problema en Caná no es simplemente la ausencia de vino para la celebración. Es la ausencia de la participación comunitaria y de pacto representa el vino. Cuando Jesús instruye a los sirvientes a llenar las vasijas vacías con agua, la narración establece una conexión profunda entre el agua utilizada para el lavado ritual y el vino utilizado para la celebración del pacto. A través de la lente de la Torá, este acto abre una relación íntima entre el agua y el vino, vinculándolo a los grandes momentos de liberación de la historia de Israel. El agua recuerda el cruce del Mar Rojo, donde los israelitas pasaron de la esclavitud a la libertad, y el cruce del río Jordán, donde entraron en la Tierra Prometida.

La transformación del agua en vino en Caná no es un reemplazo del ritual judío, sino una profundización de sus dimensiones liberadoras. Así como las aguas del Mar Rojo y del Jordán eran umbrales de liberación, también la transformación de Caná significa un paso del ritual a la alegría. La abundancia de vino revela que la obra de liberación no termina con la libertad, sino que continúa en la celebración, la comunidad y la misión compartida. La historia de Caná nos invita a ver que los procesos de liberación, transformación y alianza están entrelazados en la visión de Dios de reparación y renovación para el mundo.
